Freshman Learning Communities (FLCs)

Freshman Learning Communities (FLCs) provide students with unique learning opportunities, but, unlike the living-learning communities, these do not involve students living together in the same residence hall. FLCs are small groups of students who easily become good friends by taking several courses together and by meeting weekly with a faculty member to discuss the topic of the community. FLC topics range from ones that explore particular majors, to those that help students develop good campus survival skills, to several that probe other interesting topics.

Living-Learning Communities (LLCs)

Living-Learning Communities differ from Freshmen Learning Communities because participating students not only take a one-credit seminar and core courses together, they also live and study together in a residential setting. Each LLC is designed with specific students in mind and include services, programs and activities to enhance the academic program for those students. Students participate in LLCs for both Fall and Spring semesters during the freshman year. Some LLCs continue into the sophomore through senior years.

Source: http://www.as.ua.edu/learningcommunities/